

Deliverable 5: Social-Management & Feedback

Mastering the Art of Giving and Receiving Feedback in Professional Settings

100% Journey Milestone Completed - Bravo!

100% done! Bravo! But before we go ahead to summarize learnings to produce an action plan, let's reflect upon what you learned during this last module regarding social-management, key communication strategies, active listening, the art of giving and receiving feedback, and leveraging social surroundings.

Assignment Prompt

Practice giving and receiving feedback. Choose a scenario where feedback might have been given or received, such as a team meeting, a performance review, or a personal conversation. Reflect on an experience when feedback was given or received, how it went, and how you would handle it now using your social-management skills.

1. Scenario Selection

Team Project Review Meeting

During a collaborative data analysis project presentation review, I needed to give constructive feedback to a team member whose section of the report lacked detailed data validation and clear visual breakdowns, which threatened the overall quality of our final submission.

2. How the Situation Originally Handled (What Happened)

Initial Attempt & Challenges

Initially, under pressure to meet tight deadlines, the feedback was delivered too bluntly during a rushed group conversation ("This data section is incomplete and messy"). Because the delivery felt accusatory rather than supportive, the colleague became defensive, leading to tension and an unproductive back-and-forth instead of collaborative problem-solving.

3. Reflection Using Social-Management & Feedback Principles

Analyzing What Went Wrong

Reflecting on this using our social-management modules, I realized the mistake was failing to separate the person from the problem and neglecting emotional resonance. Effective feedback requires empathy, a safe psychological environment, and a structured approach (such as focusing on specific behaviors and collective goals rather than generalized criticism).

4. How I Would Handle It Now

Applying Structured Feedback Techniques

With our current understanding of active listening and constructive communication, I would handle this situation differently by: (1) scheduling a calm, one-on-one discussion rather than a public critique; (2) opening with appreciation for their hard work; (3) using objective data to highlight specific areas for improvement without triggering defensiveness; and (4) actively listening to their constraints and brainstorming support solutions together.

Submission Checklist

- ☐ Select and outline a realistic feedback scenario.
- ☐ Detail how the interaction unfolded and evaluate its outcome.
- ☐ Submit your completed reflection response before the final deadline.